2011 recipients

Elizabeth Breen, MD

Doctor Breen's research investigated the impact of family on a female surgeon's career

Heather Paladine, MD

Dr. Paladine investigated the key characteristics, benefits and challenges of women family physicians that practice in rural settings.

2010 recipients

Rachel Levine, MD and Hilit Mechaber, MD

Drs. Levine and Mechaber studied best practices for mentoring female medical students by analyzing data from a series of student and faculty focus groups.

2009 recipient

Nicole J. Borges, PhD

Dr. Borges and her team of investigators surveyed a representative sample of all women physicians in academic medicine in order to gain perspective on how, when and why physicians choose an academic path.

2008 recipients

| Sue Yom, MD, PhD

Dr. Yom examined why women faculty leave and the costs associated by the respective institutions due to this lack of retention.

| Maurice Clifton, MD, MEd

Dr. Clifton examined the two kinds of obstacles he believes prevent more women from practicing in rural areas.

2007 recipients

| Patricia Turner, MD

Dr. Turner was interested in examining the impact questions and attitudes regarding childbearing have on a woman's decision to pursue a career in surgery. She also investigated if a career choice of surgery has negative impacts on a woman's likelihood to bear children.

| Ethan Jewett, MA

Mr. Jewett hoped to identify the barriers currently keeping inactive physicians out of practice in order to develop useful solutions and models for physicians to reenter the workforce.

2006 recipient

Reshma Jagsi, MD, DPHIL, was the first recipient of the Joan F. Giambalvo Fund for the Advancement of Women.

Dr. Jagsi was the primary author of the article "The 'Gender Gap' in Academic Medical Literature—a 35-year perspective," which found that while the proportion of women among both first and senior physician-authors of original research in the United States had increased, women still composed a minority of the authors of original research and guest editorials in the journals. Dr. Jagsi received

Giambalvo funding to research the gender gap in the attainment of independent funding for research.
