

Advance care planning at Medicare visits

THE MYTH

Advance care planning (ACP) must be addressed at every Medicare patient visit.

DEBUNKING THE MYTH

Advance care planning is not required to be addressed at every Medicare patient visit. Medicare does not place any frequency-related requirements or restrictions on addressing ACP due to the variability in need for the service among patients. For instance, patients who are very ill or have experienced changes in their health status may need to have ACP conversations multiple times a year, while less frequent conversations may be adequate for others.

BACKGROUND

Advance care planning is a billable, face-to-face service between a physician (or nurse practitioner, physician assistant, or clinical nurse specialist) and a patient and/or surrogate (e.g., health care agent, designated decisionmaker, family member, or caregiver) to discuss and make known the patient's health care wishes in case the patient becomes unable to make health care decisions for themselves.<sup>1</sup>

Advance care planning includes, but is not limited to, education, discussion, completion, and review of advance directives. Common advance directives are the living will and durable power of attorney for health care.<sup>2</sup> ACP performed during a Medicare Annual Wellness Visit (AWV) is considered a component of the AWV and is not separately reimbursed; however, when performed separately from an AWV it is reimbursable as a medically necessary service. When ACP services are performed and billed, documentation of a change in the patient's health status and/or their wishes about end-of-life care is required.<sup>1</sup>
